One of the hardest things to do in criminal investigation is to link a serial criminal to all of the events he is responsible for. Unlike a serial rapist or serial killer where there is normally a large amount of forensic evidence left at the crime scene, the serial arsonist can leave little to no trace of his presence at the scene. The wild land serial arsonist becomes even more elusive as the target area for his crimes is remote and rural, and thus provides very few witnesses to the event. In these very difficult cases, the wild land arson investigator must step his game up to the highest levels and exploit every bit of evidence he can find, to include “human behavior evidence.” The investigator then must attempt to link a single arson scene to multiple others in his hunt for the serial arsonist.

This year’s Serial Wildland Arson Investigation Training will take the investigator into higher levels of analysis and investigation. It will mix traditional scene and “police work” with emerging technologies and analysis. Along with the analysis of true case histories, this year’s training will include pattern and target analysis in a serial case, forensic interviewing techniques for wild land fire investigators, the use of electronic surveillance and tracking systems in investigations, and preparing yourself and your case for intense examination in a courtroom by skilled attorneys. The heavily experienced instructors will come from law enforcement, the fire service, the private sector, Canada, and agencies at the local, state, and federal level in the United States. An added bonus this year will be refresher training in the basics of wild land fire/arson investigation.
